Re: PS Docket No. 07-114

Secretary Dortch,

Technology has expanded to the degree that it touches almost every aspect of our lives today. It allows individuals to be better informed and more connected than ever to their communities. Police officers' typical duties across the greater Dayton area have been dramatically affected by technology. Officers are able to do more on the scene of a call now than ever before. Police cruisers today more resemble the cockpit of a jet plane than they do a typical car.

Technology has been used to build a connection with citizens and communities via information sharing across multiple applications simultaneously, through more effective communication lines between first responders, and with more efficient reporting from the scene of calls. The one place that technology needs to be improved is the location accuracy of emergency calls from inside of homes and buildings. Our officers can have all the first class tools in world, but none of them will make the difference if we cannot find the victim.

In an age where the landline is going the way of the rotary phone, it is important to update our emergency line to fit the technology of today. Please put the lives of citizens ahead of the desire of phone companies and require better location accuracy for 9-1-1 calls from cell phones. People calling 9-1-1 don't have the time for us to narrow down a location they need our help now.

Sincerely,

Mike Galbraith,
